Fort Collins – The Community Foundation of Northern Colorado has launched a search for its new president and chief executive officer.

The Foundation’s search committee is looking for a proven executive who can take a proven organization and lead it to new heights. “This is an important and exciting time that will set up the Foundation to be even stronger in the future,” said Denise Juliana, chair of the search committee. “We are focused on finding our next leader who will continue to inspire and unify the communities we serve.”

The new president will be the voice and champion for philanthropy and community throughout Northern Colorado. They embody the core values of the Foundation, including to provide donor-focused and personalized service, be a catalyst for community action, serve as a trusted steward, demonstrate inclusivity and respectfulness, foster collaboration, and lead nonpartisan discussions and initiatives. They provide the vision, direction, inspiration, and motivation to ensure the Foundation’s success.

The Foundation has engaged Denver-based White River Strategy to assist the Foundation search committee as it replaces Ray Caraway, who departed after serving as president/CEO for more than 17 years.
